

Certain media content providers somehow feel that their audience is their property, to mandate what they watch, and when. I have no particular problem with this aspect, after all, I can choose to watch their content or not. However, if I am about to purchase an expensive television, I do not feel it is appropriate for some media companies to mandate how I use a piece of electronics for which I have paid, handsomely. If they are concerned that I might copy their broadcast, they (like I) have the right to not broadcast it. Apparently, these companies are still fighting the Sony Betamax war.

Thank you for your consideration.

-- Norman Reitzel